UK Outlook for Friday 17 Dec 2021 to Sunday 26 Dec 2021:
Friday is expected to be mild and cloudy, but mainly dry with lighter winds. Through this period, high pressure, already across southern areas, is expected to build further north, pushing the wind and rain away from all areas apart from the extreme northwest. Here any rain will be light, giving a much drier second half to December for all. Although rather cloudy at first, cloud amounts should reduce through the period, especially in the south and southeast. Temperatures near average to start, and locally mild in the north, although they will tend to become colder in time for Christmas, especially in southern areas. As a result, the risk of frost and fog increases, the fog slow to clear through the mornings, and perhaps lasting all day in some places.
